

The idea behind the timer and counter hardware are very close. Both utilise a register to keep track of some events, whereas the timer keeps track of seconds, the counter usually monitors an input signal for events.

The timer usually uses the design clock edges to measure the time elapsed after the user request.

The counter counts the number of events occurring on its input and shows the result on its output. It usually has a reset input as well.

